PRISON DEFINITION

Is a place to hold individuals convicted of more serious crimes with a minimum, medium, or maximum security. It s a punishment place too. A few get better and some get worst and go back to crimes.

Approximately half of the U.S. jail population consists of pretrial detainees who have not been convicted or sentenced. Prisoners serving terms longer than one year are typically housed in prison facilities operated by state governments.

STAY OUT OF TROUBLE, IT DOESN'T MEAN YOU ARE FREE

Dr. Rachid El Mounacifi

Committing a crime doesn't always mean doing time. While a criminal conviction usually carries a sentence of some sort, there are alternatives to prison. Sometimes alternative methods are used alone, or are combined. The object stays the same, which is to provide punishment, preserve the best chance for rehabilitation, and to serve the best interest of the public.

WHAT ARE THE ALTERNATIVES TO PRISON?

Therefore, alternatives to prison should be used to reduce the number of prisoners, which subsequently improves the quality of prison life while lowering the financial costs to society.

Between crime and radicalization

I'm putting the light on radicalization like no one did before, and the mechanisms behind it. I provide examples of how to prevent and counteract the phenomenon spreading and increasing the groundwork for fear, fragmentation, Islamophobia, racism and discrimination, with increased education, information and integration at all levels of society, schools, workplaces, etc.

CONCLUSION

We all know the prison history and we all know that the results are very poor, so why to go on putting people behind bars. During my researches and my TV shows, I had the chance to meet hundreds of prisoners, listen to their stories and nearly 91% prefer to be outside the walls, that's why we need punishment alternatives. This conclusion is collected from a random sample of 200 prisoners that I talked to.

Personally, I don't think that hard punishment will reduce the number of crimes and criminals, that's why it's about time to start finding new solutions. Holding people is holding energies that we can use to build a better world.
